

A family business

Four generations of the same family have shaped Deer Park since 1870. From the original owner, George Cairns, who made his fortune from the rubber industry in Florida, through the family after Cairns' death, the business has grown to become a leading provider of high-quality, sustainable timber products. The family's commitment to excellence and innovation has made Deer Park a household name in the timber industry.

Thomas Cairns was passionate about the great outdoors. He studied and developed sustainable forest management techniques that were new to the area, allowing to create a more natural environment by using natural and local species. He was the first to plant trees, and his efforts during his lifetime have led to the forest that the world around him now knows.

Harry L. Cairns, the popular entrepreneur, arrived in 1908 and joined the family business. He was a leader in the timber industry and a pioneer in sustainable forest management. He was the first to plant trees, and his efforts during his lifetime have led to the forest that the world around him now knows.

John Cairns, Thomas Cairns' son, continued the family business. He was a leader in the timber industry and a pioneer in sustainable forest management. He was the first to plant trees, and his efforts during his lifetime have led to the forest that the world around him now knows.

John Cairns, the current owner of Deer Park, is a fourth-generation member of the family. He is a leader in the timber industry and a pioneer in sustainable forest management. He is the first to plant trees, and his efforts during his lifetime have led to the forest that the world around him now knows.
